SYNOPSIS

Dot Farley and her husband were giving a big reception to announce the engagement of their niece Harriett. The young man was Jack Richardson, a bogus count who had succeeded in imposing on them. Ben Turpin arrived, and after troubles with Bevan the butler, who was for throwing him out at once, managed to deliver a letter to Dot Farley's husband. It was from an old friend of his, Ben's uncle, who reminded him that they had always meant to have Ben and Harriet marry each other, and added the information that Ben was the owner of hundreds of oil wells, worth millions. To break the engagement to Richardson then and there seemed the only natural thing to do.

Ben was ushered upstairs with the reluctant Bevan for a valet. He immediately mistook Phyllis, the pretty chambermaid, for the Harriet he was to marry, and started an ardent flirtation. Between Dot Farley and Bevan, who was furiously jealous, he was finally convinced of his mistake and went downstairs to meet the real Harriet, who fainted away at the sight of him.

While the family were all entertaining Ben at the golf course, it appeared that the real cause of Harriet's distress was not her new lover's crossed eyes but the fact that she wanted to marry George the chauffeur. She took every chance to steal away with him, while Ben took the same chances to make love to Phyllis. Meantime Richardson, let into the house by Kalla Pasha, the chef, revenged himself for the loss of girl and fortune by stealing the family jewels.

Finally the great day dawned when Harriet and Ben were to be married. Various mishaps delayed the ceremony, and at last a telegram arrived saying that Ben had lost all his oil wells and had no money at all. Ben was kicked into the kitchen in disgrace and aunt and uncle set out once more after Richardson the count. He saw them coming and fled, thinking they were after him for the jewels, but they captured him and led him back to Harriet. Just as the ceremony started again. Ben's uncle walked in, laughed at the telegram, which had been sent by George and Harriet, and said Ben not only had all his old oil wells but forty new ones. After Ben again, they found that Bevan and Kalla Pasha had chased him out of the house, and the complications of finding him gave all the lovers a chance to pair off as they wished.
